The fools in this story said they saw but they didn't. As the real fools saw things, they were the wise and the rest were foolish. However, Socrates and the little boy (and the swindlers) were the wise ones. Socrates knew he didn't know and the boy knew he didn't see even while everyone claimed they were capable of these things.

I liked the first one, "The Boy Who Said No," a lot better. I wanted to read this because I wanted to know what happened to our hero after he arrived in the States, but was disappointed by the disjointed story telling and "purple prose" - everything from the descriptions of Frank and Magda's lovemaking to the (not very) suspenseful search by Frank's nemesis, Peno and the shootout in the woods.
